"MEMORY CORRUPTION DETECTED.
Proceeding with ũ'ĀBREAST EXPANSIONŠ"

The mammary gland is a gland located in the breasts of females. Lactation, or the production of milk, both males and females have breasts; however, in females the glandular tissue begins to develop after childbirth. Estrogen release. Mammary glands only produce milk after childbirth. Hormones progesterone and prolactin are released. The progesterone prevents the mammary glands from lactating. During this time, a substance called colostrum are produced. This liquid is rich in antibodies to sustain an infant during the first few days of life. After childbirth, the levels of prolactin remain raised. This signals the lactating. Each time a baby is breastfed the milk is emptied. From afterward, the mammary glands are signaled to continue producing milk. At menopause, the time when menstruation stops, the tissues of the ducts and degenerate. This causes involution, or shrinkage, of the mammary gland loses the ability to produce milk.
